Study links late sleep schedules to unhealthy behaviors

A study in the journal Sleep Health found teens who go to bed late and wake up late tend to consume more calories, eat more carbohydrates and be less physically active. These "night owl" teens often skip breakfast and have unhealthy late-evening snacks. The trend weakened when school ws not in session.

Full Story: HealthDay News (3/31)